the world. The EU environmental policy and law has become the major driving force for environmental policy and law in the member states. With the ratification of the Paris Agreement (2015) and adoption of the Green Deal for Europe, climate change has entered the sphere of binding obligation, both for the EU itself and its member States. As the environment is one of the shared competences, the European Union has put in place an efficient legal framework to assert its position in this area.

In July 2021, the EU Commission adopted a series of legislative proposals (known as “Fit for 55”) setting out how the Commission intends to achieve climate neutrality in the EU by 2050.

In line with this continuity, France, the Czech Republic and Sweden presented their programme for the 18 months of their successive presidencies. If it contains measures regarding climate change and carbon neutrality, national implementation as well as contentious cases demonstrate some disparity within the application of the environmental obligations, such as “Notre affaire à tous” before the French courts, or the “Túrow coal mine” case brought before the EU Court of Justice by the Czech Republic.

The Council of the European Union (shortly Council) is an essential EU decision-maker. It is a non-permanent, collective, supreme body of the European Union representing the interests of the EU Member States. It negotiates and adopts legislative acts mostly together with the European Parliament which represents the voice of the European citizens. Every six months a different EU Member State holds the Presidency of the Council. The EU Member States prepare for the Presidency of the Council in partnership with three member states (the so-called “trio”) to ensure a smooth transition between presidencies and a long-term continuity and effectiveness of the Council work. The trio determines long-term objectives and draws-up a programme of major issues the Council will deal with over the 18-month period of the trio presidency.

Since the 1970s, the European environmental policy established itself from a by-product of economic integration into an independent policy area. The EU environmental law, comprising today more than 500 directives, regulations and decisions, forms the most comprehensive set of environmental standards in Since January 1st, 2022, the Council is presided over by France, which will be followed by the Czech Republic from July 1st, 2022 and by Sweden from January 1st, 2023. The increasing impacts of climate change, overconsumption of natural resources and the alarming rate of biodiversity loss are one of the most pressing environmental challenges the Europe is facing, and the current and future presidencies will have to address it.

This international workshop aims to explore how and to what extent the French – Czech – Swedish Presidencies of the Council of the EU can be expected to succeed in moving forward the EU’s plan to become the world leader in sustainability and climate protection while dealing with other pressing issues such as COVID-19 pandemic and war in Ukraine. Political, legal, scientific as well as ethical perspectives of the current trio presidency’s impact on EU environmental policy and law will be considered and discussed.
